He is lost, my son is lost, . Have any of you seen him; Ie was tall and lithe and handsome And strong of body and limb. lis cheeks were red as apples, His eyes were bright and blue, His teeth were white and even, And he was good an I true.

But somehow I have lost him And I do need him so; want my darling Charlie, Old tell me where to go. some of you must have known him, He was so blithe and gay, h, take pity, friends, upon me

And help me in the way. Sure some of you must know him, My Charlie, all my pride; He's only lost a little while-They told me he had died. But I anow better; in my heart

I feel that he is near;

Who loves her son so dear. But friends, oh! it is oruel, That you so silent keep; You need not fear that I'll give way I know my son; I'm proud and glad To have so good a boy; So tell me where he is good folks,

I will not faint from joy. I've wandered all this country o'er, Since my dear boy was lost; I've walked and walked and wept and praye Through heat and through the frost; ve asked so many where he was, Who only turned and smiled; And others looked so sad and grieved,

It drove me almost wild. And I've slept out in the air, And I have searched so long, so long That grief has bleached my hair. Please tell me where he is, my friends, My strength is almost spent, I must find Charlie, my dear son. Oh, tell me where he went."

Twas a woman, old and worn and pale, In faded, ragged clothes; Who held her claw-like hands In helpless prayer to those Who gathered idly in the street, And stood in silence there. While this poor mother, crazed with grief. Made this pathetic prayer.

No answer came to heal her heart, No hand outstretched in aid; Too common was her misery. The boy for whom she prayed, Why, what was he? A hundred boys Were lost, and mother's tears Flowed on in silence down pale cheeks,

And so had flowed for years. And so the people one by one,

Began to turn and go; lome were careless, some were touched, By that old woman's woe; But still she mouned and wrung her hi And uttered still her prayer: Oh where is he? I sant my boy, My boy, so young and fair."

From out the crowd an unkempt tramp, Shumbled with shameful pace; His clothes were rage, his eyes were bles To where he'd fallen. He neared her side. "Mother, look at me!"

I'll break the bonds of slavery.

Lost I was, but now I'm found. Oh, God, I praise thee now! Look down upon me pitying Christ, Listen and hear my vow.
